New York Street Kids Offered Choice.

Mike Goodwin is a counselor at the TASS state school in Manhattan, attended by kids from housing projects in the poorer neighbourhoods of the East Village. He describes how art, yoga and being a good listener help him to distract pupils from the culture of drugs and gangs waiting for them outside the school gates.

(1) _____ It's a melting pot, an ever-changing part of the city. It's an artistic area, so in many ways it's known for being liberal. The school seems to fit in well with the community, but we're always looking for new ways to bond the two, such as internships and community service for the students.

(2) _____ It's important to us. We went through some major incidents in the US – such as the shootings in Columbine and Virginia Tech – where teens expressed themselves in an extremely negative way, and this has highlighted the need for counseling in schools. We need to address the problems before they become too big.

(3) _____ We teach programmes in drama, music and visual arts, and try to use art as a tool to build bridges between subjects. The kids can even do yoga in their music class. [...]

(4) _____ Some of them can be neglectful of their children. Others are in prison, or have disappeared completely. [...]

(5) _____ As in many schools in New York, students begin to be targeted by gangs as early as junior high. Some are approached by gang members outside of school. I'd say we have about three or four funerals a year related to gang violence – not among our students but the member of their families, their cousins or siblings. This is a high-risk area and the kids have to grow up fast. [...]

(6) _____ Our kids don't have access to the after-school activities or private tutoring that more affluent kids do. Eventually they'll be faced with college and the question of how they're going to pay for it. But all our students are capable of good work, and we try to promote that and make sure they're on the right track. [...]

(7) _____ We've come such a long way: we're now in our fourth year and we're one of the top three schools in the area. I think it's reflected in the students. They really enjoy being here, they're learning, and furthermore, most of their parents feel the same way. I'm excited about where we're going
